In my final poster, the lines play a huge role in directing attention. The sharp geometric line of the walkway pull the viewer straight toward the astronaut, almost like an arrow pointing at them.

Meanwhile, the softer organic lines in the nebula create a drifting motion that contrasts with the rigid structure of the station.

This combination makes the mood feel both lonely and peaceful, as if the astronaut is suspended between order and chaos.

The element that stands out the most is definitely the astronaut's silhouette. The strong contrast between the bright white light hitting their suit and the deep purples of the nebula behind them makes them impossible to ignore. The principles of contrast and emphasis are doing most of the work here. The algorithm misunderstood my texture slightly and it made the nebula more smoky than cloudy, which changed the softness I originally imagined. For my second attempt, I changed the textures from smooth metallic panels to rougher, scratched metal. This single adjustment made the entire poster feel more worn and tense.

almost like the station had been abandoned or damaged. The mood shifted from peaceful isolation to something more mysterious unsettling.
